Awakening as a Feminist

In 1902, Sanger married William Sanger, an artist and architect. The couple moved to New York City, where Margaret became involved in socialist and feminist movements. She encountered activists such as Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman, who introduced her to radical ideas about women's rights and social justice.

The Birth Control Movement

In 1916, Sanger opened the first birth control clinic in the United States, located in New York City's Brownsville neighborhood. The clinic provided contraception to working-class women, defying the law at the time. Sanger and her associates were arrested and faced legal battles, but their mission remained undeterred.

Fighting for Reproductive Rights

Over the next several decades, Sanger tirelessly advocated for reproductive freedom. She founded the American Birth Control League, later renamed Planned Parenthood, and collaborated with other organizations to educate the public and lobby for changes in laws. Sanger's passionate speeches and writings sparked national conversations about sex, family planning, and women's empowerment.

International Impact

Sanger's influence extended beyond the United States. She established the International Planned Parenthood Federation (IPPF) in 1952, creating a global network of organizations dedicated to providing reproductive healthcare services worldwide. Her advocacy efforts played a significant role in shaping international policies and attitudes towards birth control.
