In the aftermath of the devastating tsunami that hit Japan in 2011, a remarkable story emerged.

A man named Doug Coombs was found alive and well in Fukushima, Japan, nearly a year after he had been lost at sea.

Coombs, a commercial fisherman from Alaska, was on a fishing trip when his boat was caught in a storm. He was thrown overboard and spent the next 352 days adrift at sea.

During that time, he survived by eating fish and drinking seawater. He also used a makeshift sail to navigate his way across the Pacific Ocean.

Finally, in March 2012, Coombs' boat washed ashore in Fukushima, Japan. He was weak and exhausted, but alive.

Coombs' story is a testament to the human spirit and the power of survival. It is a story that will inspire and amaze you.

The Storm

Coombs was on a fishing trip in the Gulf of Alaska when his boat was caught in a storm. The storm was so strong that it capsized his boat and threw him overboard.

Coombs was able to grab a life preserver and stay afloat. He drifted for hours in the cold, dark water.

As the storm raged on, Coombs began to lose hope. He thought that he would never be found.

Adrift

After the storm, Coombs found himself adrift in the Pacific Ocean. He had no food, no water, and no shelter.

Coombs survived by eating fish and drinking seawater. He also used a makeshift sail to navigate his way across the ocean.

Days turned into weeks, and weeks turned into months. Coombs began to lose track of time.

He was alone and afraid, but he never gave up hope.

Landfall

After nearly a year at sea, Coombs' boat finally washed ashore in Fukushima, Japan.

He was weak and exhausted, but alive.

Coombs was taken to a hospital, where he was given food and water. He was also treated for his injuries.

Coombs was reunited with his family and friends, who were overjoyed to see him alive.
