The Anabasis of Cyrus is a historical account of the march of the Ten Thousand Greek mercenaries who were hired by Cyrus the Younger to help him overthrow his brother, Artaxerxes II, for the throne of Persia. The march took place in 401-400 BC and covered over 2,000 miles. The Greeks eventually reached the Black Sea, where they were rescued by a Spartan fleet.

The Anabasis is one of the most famous works of ancient Greek literature. It was written by Xenophon, who was one of the Ten Thousand. Xenophon's account is a valuable source of information about the Persian Empire, the Greek military, and the history of the Peloponnesian War.

The Anabasis has been translated into many languages and has been adapted into several films and television shows. It is a classic work of literature that continues to be enjoyed by readers today.

The March of the Ten Thousand

In 401 BC, Cyrus the Younger, the satrap of Lydia, Ionia, and Cappadocia, decided to challenge his brother, Artaxerxes II, for the throne of Persia. Cyrus hired a force of 13,000 Greek mercenaries to help him in his campaign.

The Greeks were led by a group of experienced generals, including Clearchus, Proxenus, and Xenophon. The Greeks marched through Asia Minor and reached the Euphrates River in the spring of 400 BC. They then crossed the river and marched into Babylonia.

The Greeks encountered the Persian army at Cunaxa, near Babylon, in September 400 BC. The Greeks were victorious in the battle, but Cyrus was killed. After the battle, the Greeks were stranded in the middle of the Persian Empire.

The Greeks decided to march back to Greece. They traveled north through Babylonia, Assyria, and Armenia. They then crossed the mountains into the Black Sea region.

The Greeks reached the Black Sea in the spring of 399 BC. They were rescued by a Spartan fleet and returned to Greece.
